“CLIMATE CHANGE, SOCIAL INEQUALITY AND HEALTH CRISIS IN IBEROAMERICAN COUNTRIES”

At the beginning of the 21st century, the Covid-19 pandemic has marked the future of humanity, exacerbating social problems in Latin America and abroad, and making it increasingly difficult to achieve general well-being in a context of greater contamination that aggravates the situation. Current generations face a singular health challenge that has had widespread effects on the various activities and living conditions of the population—a new fact that has not only deepened old problems, but revealed new ones as well.

Although the origin of the problem is common—the SARS-Cov-2 virus—its impacts on different societies, nations, and regions of the planet are and will continue to be heterogeneous; likewise its effects on economies, social relations, well-being, and rights in the short-, medium-, and long-term.

At the beginning of this century, the region of Latin America was continuing to insert itself into the international economy, largely through the export of commodities. The financial crisis of 2008-2009, and then the pandemic, interrupted and reduced growth rates in several countries, while others were able to reduce the impact thanks to the diversity of their resources. Countries such as Argentina found themselves below the average growth rate of 1.8% and others, such as Mexico, Chile, Colombia, and Peru, above.

From a social perspective, it has not been possible in recent decades to reduce the massive levels of poverty that affect a large part of the inhabitants of Latin America, nor to reduce the historical socio-economic inequality that has characterized it. And the reactions to the spread of the coronavirus have brought with them a weakening of social cohesion and greater expressions of discontent and vulnerability.

The high mortality, the huge demands on resources for public health, and the paralysis of the physical mobility of goods and people is taking a significant economic toll on all countries in the region. Relatedly, the closure of parts of industry and the reduction of international flights and transport, for example, have meant a decreased use of fossil fuels, which has contributed to reducing air pollution, leading to a degree of optimism regarding environmental sustainability. Such optimism, however, may well be temporary, since it is probable that pollution will begin where it left off upon reactivation.

From a political point of view, Latin America entered the 21st century after a period of expansion of democratic methods for the election of its governments, although in general this did not translate to more governance or the consolidation of states and laws. As such, democratic institutions in several Latin American countries appear to be undergoing processes of deconstruction.

In general, the prospects for economic reactivation both at the world level and in the Ibero-American continent as a whole depend, in the first instance, on the success of the dissemination of scientific advances to immunize the population. Following that, prospects depend on the implementation of economic and social policies that pursue more economically, socially and environmentally sustainable development for the region.

ABOUT SASE

Founded in 1989, the Society for the Advancement of Socioeconomics (SASE) is an international institution with members in more than fifty countries. SASE organizes a major annual meeting in addition to regional meetings and local academic events. The society publishes a scientific journal, Socio-Economic Review (SER) on a quarterly basis.

In 2013, SASE held its 1st Ibero-American Socio-Economics Meeting at the National Autonomous University of Mexico. The 2nd Ibero-American Socio-Economics Meeting was held in Porto Alegre, at the Federal University of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil in 2015 and the 3rd meeting took place in Cartagena, Colombia in 2017. The 4th Ibero-American Socio-Economics Meeting was held in 2019 at the School of Economics of the National University, in Heredia, Costa Rica. Given the worldwide health crisis, the 5th meeting will be held virtually, with the sponsorship of the Universidad Nacional Mayor de San Marcos, Lima, Peru, in December 2021.
